Built in the period's style of industrial buildings, the villa is the last surviving cultural monument to the important cement factory that stood on the site of the current swimming stadium in Podolí. Its wooden casement windows, original doors, granite staircases, cast-iron railings, and elements made of Slivenec marble on the street-facing facade by the elegant entrance staircase have been preserved. The gables have round windows (replicas of the original ones). The house is made of bricks and is built on concrete foundation strips. The property has a generous total area of 7,141 sq. m. The paved area, which serves as a car park, can be extended if necessary and there is also a garage for 1 vehicle.

Now the property is currently used as corporate headquarters; the current layout offers a large number of offices, bathrooms, technical facilities, and storage space.

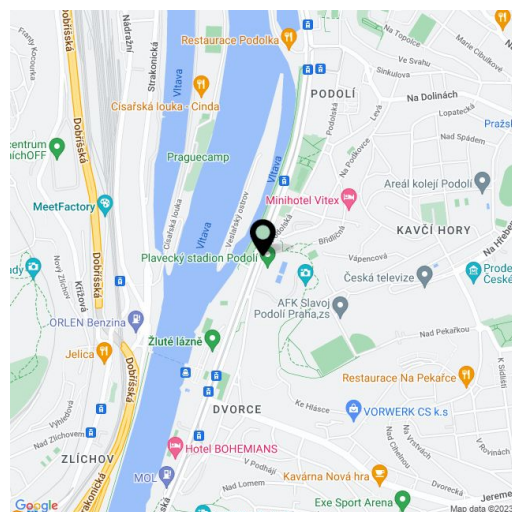

The property was previously used by the British International School, which operated an elementary school here and then housed company management.

According to the zoning plan and the dimensions of the plot, 2 buildings can be added on both sides of the villa, which could be then be connected to the existing villa. The internal layout can be transformed into both residential and business use.

The villa's location is very easily accessible from the Podolské embankment, but it is separated from the main road by a wide strip of mature trees. The villa is located just a short walk from the Žluté lázně swimming center. The Podolí district is very popular, especially for its amount of greenery, wide range of sports activities, and great accessibility.
